Emotion in Argumentation

Barbara Konat, Cristian Santibáñez (editors)

Emotion in Argumentation presents interdisciplinary perspectives on the role of emotion in persuasive discourse. It includes contributions from argumentation theory, psychology, linguistics, and computational approaches and explores topics such as emotional appeals in political and legal argumentation, social media discourse, personal narratives, and well-being.

The authors examine emotions as an integral component of argumentative interaction. The articles collected here demonstrate how theoretical, empirical, and computational approaches together contribute to a better understanding of the role of emotion in argumentation across diverse communicative and cultural contexts.
